1. [] is grateful for the advance copy of reference paper which will be of considerable help in our local thinking about the Soviet problem. We were particularly impressed by the concept of continuity in working on a given Soviet in the course of several field assignments.

2. It would seem that in some cases where a personal relationship, however guarded, has been developed between a KUBARK officer and a Soviet who is returning to the USSR but will presumably come out again for another field tour, it might be useful to provide the Soviet with a means of contacting "his" KUBARKER. This could be done by giving him a letter drop in a relatively low key..."You can always reach me at this address. When you come out again, drop me a line if there's anything I can do for you. I travel quite a bit and would be happy to come and see you."

3. Such letter drops would have to be maintained and serviced over the long run, but the same drop could presumably be used for a number of officers as long as all of them were already identified by the RIS. The drop addresses should be simple and easy to remember so that even if the Soviet does not consciously try to remember it, he could recall it at some later date when he wished to contact KUBARK. A number of officers receiving such addresses would undoubtedly report them and, thereby, unintentionally provide colleagues with an additional method by which they could contact KUBARK if they wish and are willing to exercise some ingenuity.

4. If Headquarters sees merit in this proposal, [] would like such an address for possible use with Akhtiam K. Sakhapov [] who hopes to leave [] PCS at the end of the year.
